Pepperdine NSCP-ISPP Handbook for Preceptors

THANK YOU for taking the time to be a preceptor and give of your knowledge, skills, and experience to help train future RDNs.

The Internship team consists of three people 1) Preceptor 2) Intern and 3) Director of ISPP program. It is important that this team communicates throughout the rotation and that any issues or questions be brought to the director. As the preceptor we consider you an integral part of the team and value your feedback.

Preceptor Training

In an effort to provide you with the background on the policies and forms utilized in the internship we ask you to review the preceptor handbook and follow-up with the director with any questions. This handbook will allow you to have knowledge of the expectations of the interns and the role of each member of the team.

We highly recommend each preceptor review the syllabus and forms associated with their rotation and review with the director in person or over the phone prior to hosting an intern.

In addition, CDR (Commission on Dietetic Registration) provides a free online preceptor training. It is a very valuable tool to assist in preparing to work with interns.

The course is self paced and provides 8 CPEUs when completed.

To access the course go to : <http://www.cdrcampus.com> Once you arrive here you can click on "Dietetics Preceptor Training Program" and create a new account that will allow you to log in and complete education courses. It will track your progress so you do not need to complete it in one sitting.

Communicating with the Intern and Preceptor

The director is responsible for weekly communication with the intern at the Monday meetings and throughout the program. The director serve as a liason between the preceptor and intern should any questions or concerns arise. In most cases direct communication between the preceptor and the intern is best, however the director is available to facilitate discussions or guide changes in the behavior of the intern if needed.

3. Role of the Preceptor

The supervised practice is the bridge from a student being a somewhat passive learner in a classroom to an active learner and participant in the professional work place. This learning curve is different for each intern and the goal is to see growth and change so that the intern moves from a novice to competent in nutrition knowledge.

Patience, guidance and communication is essential for the intern to move from acquiring knowledge (undergraduate degree) to application of the knowledge (supervised practice). You, the preceptor, play a key role in assisting the intern on this growth curve. Thank you!

Responsibilities of the preceptor:

1. Be prepared for the intern by reviewing the handbook and activity syllabus, follow-up with director for clarification or questions.
2. Arrange for an orientation to the facility and rotation on the first day and discuss clear expectations and due dates of assignments with the intern.
3. Provide regular communication and feedback with the intern, both formally and informally. It is very important that if you observe the intern not performing as they should that you communicate this as soon as possible, rather than wait until the formal evaluation time. This allows the intern the opportunity to adjust and fix the behavior with adequate time.
4. Be a role model in your profession by demonstrating skills and behaviors to the intern and assist the intern with time management and professional development.
5. Provide clear guidelines. As professionals with experience in the field, we often forget where we were as an intern. What may seem obvious to an experienced practitioner is often not the case with the intern. Many interns are not aware of their strengths and weaknesses at the beginning of the supervised practice. Clear guidelines should include the ground rules for the facility – arrival time, departure time, professional conduct and dress, use of cell phones, communication with preceptor, etc.. Please define your expectations with the intern from the beginning to avoid having to deal with issues later.
6. Be a resource for interns. The interns often share that what they appreciate most is hearing from the preceptor how they grew in their field and the journey from student to professional. You are a wonderful resource to an intern entering the profession of nutrition and dietetics.

Dealing with a difficult or problematic intern

While our hope is that our application process, the interview and the selection of the interns provides strong interns to the program, we know that there may be times you may have to deal with problematic behavior. Please know the director is always available to facilitate discussions and to meet with the preceptor and the intern. Acceptable behavior for an intern should be no different than if the intern were an employee of the facility and oral and/or written warnings should be given and the director should be contacted. The interns are aware that their placement at a facility is a privilege and professional behavior must be followed at all times.

THANK YOU!
We are grateful for you being part of our team!
