

Summer School Classes and Policies

Pepperdine University is closely monitoring developments for Coronavirus Disease 2019. We remain hopeful that the COVID-19 outlook will improve greatly and allow for a return to campus for the start of Session I on June 8. The University will continue to closely monitor the situation and the guidance from state and federal governmental agencies as we plan for the start of Session I. Should conditions preclude the safe resumption of classes in Malibu on June 8, we have contingency plans that provide alternate calendars for Sessions I and II/III delaying the start of each session to allow for in-person delivery of courses in Malibu. We also have prepared for the transition of all Session I, and, if necessary, all Session II/III classes for remote or online delivery. Whatever our future decisions, we will maintain regular communication with you and announce a decision on the start date and format for all Session I classes no later than May 18—three weeks before the planned start of the session.

Schedule of Classes

* Due to the many changes associated with the addition of an academic session and revision of the summer term academic calendar, course offerings will not be finalized until April 6. For this reason, students planning to enroll in summer school should check WaveNet frequently for updates.

Course Load Considerations

Students may not register for more than 8 units per session without permission from their advisor.

Summer courses, while taught in a compressed time period, still require work equivalent to a semester-length course. Even a single course can create a considerable workload, and consideration of this workload should weigh heavily in decisions to take more than one class per session.
